

LOFT OCCUPANCY AGREEMENT

This agreement is between the owner of the loft space at 12 Warehouse Row and the occupant, and sets out the understanding between them as to the use of the space. The occupant agrees to pay one thousand four hundred dollars each month, due at the beginning of the month, and the owner agrees to keep the freight elevator and the building entry in working order. Neither party intends this to be a formal lease of the kind used for apartments, and the parties have written it in plain language on purpose.

Regarding the deposit, the occupant has paid one thousand four hundred dollars which the owner holds and will return after the occupant leaves and the space has been looked over, normally within a month, minus anything needed to repair damage that goes beyond ordinary use of a loft space. The owner will explain any deduction in writing. The occupant should understand that the loft is an older industrial building and that marks on the concrete floor and brick walls are expected and will not be charged for.

The occupant may have people over and may have someone stay for a while, but the loft is for one occupant and anyone staying longer than about a month should be discussed with the owner first. Subletting the whole space to someone else is not something the owner agrees to in advance, and the occupant should ask. Short stays arranged over the internet are not permitted at all, because the building insurance does not cover them and the other occupants have objected.

Animals are a case-by-case matter and the occupant should ask before bringing one in. Noise carries in the building and the occupant should be considerate after ten at night. Either party can end this arrangement with two months of notice, and if the occupant leaves earlier than that, the occupant owes rent through the end of the notice period. The owner will not raise the rent during the first year.
